

Rising Property Taxes Top of Mind For First-Time Homebuyers In Ontario: Survey

Tax Consideration In GTA Among Highest In Canada

TORONTO (February 20, 2008) – The potential of property tax increases is on the minds of first-time homebuyers in Ontario – and the GTA in particular – according to a new report released today by Genworth Financial Canada, The Homeownership Company, a subsidiary of Genworth Financial, Inc. (NYSE:GNW).

Genworth's winter First-Time Homebuyer's Monitor provides a comprehensive snapshot of the preferences and expectations of first-time buyers across Canada. Property taxes, interest rates and high monthly payments were the highest ranked among a list of seven issues first-time buyers were asked about, while concerns that housing values might decline in the future ranked the lowest.

"It seems that the debates about higher property taxes which have been taking place at city halls across Ontario are firmly on the minds of first-time buyers, and especially among those in the Greater Toronto Area," said Peter Vukanovich, president of Genworth Financial Canada.

The City of Toronto has proposed a 3.75 per cent property tax increase, the City of Toronto's new land transfer tax took effect February 1st, and the Ontario government's three-year freeze on property tax assessment values was lifted January 1, 2008.

Almost two-thirds (65 per cent) of Ontario respondents surveyed for Genworth's latest report cited property tax increases among things they consider when buying a home. In Toronto, 69 per cent said they're worried about property taxes going up, the second highest rate of concern about the issue in Canada, behind Albertans at 72 per cent.

Practical considerations about taxes, the level of monthly payment and changes in interest rates all ranked higher in concern for residents of Ontario than the possibility of a future decline in property values, consistent with results across the country.

"Overall, this report illustrates that Canadians continue to have confidence in the strength of the housing market. They take cyclical market fluctuations in stride and are focused on the long term benefits of building equity sooner", said Vukanovich.

“That said, there are some issues which do concern them, such as rising property taxes and high monthly payments. But the good news is that there are innovative mortgage insurance solutions available to help make homeownership more affordable,” Vukanovich said.

“Canadians are savvy shoppers and they’re looking at the bigger financial picture,” said Vukanovich. “Economic factors like monthly payments, rising interest rates and property tax increases are playing a much greater role in homeownership decisions – particularly among the first-time homebuyer segment.”

“Nationally, more than two thirds (68 per cent) of respondents said that a home is the single most important investment they’ll ever make. This shows that Canadian first-time homebuyers continue to believe that buying a home remains one of the most solid personal investments they will make in their lifetimes, and that they understand the importance of achieving the goal of homeownership.”

The Genworth survey highlighted some interesting perspectives:

- The most common level of down payment intended was between 5-10 per cent, while 25 years was the most preferred amortization term and a five-year mortgage term remains most popular nationally.
- Nationally, most first-time buyers planned to spend between $100,000-$199,000, except in Alberta and the Greater Toronto Area, where respondents cited $200,000-$299,000, and British Columbia where first-time buyers expected to pay $300,000-$399,000.
- Almost 60 per cent of first-time buyers said they’d get mortgage information from the Internet, including the use of online mortgage calculators to see what monthly payment they could afford.
